

After reading the article about the Jewish refugees in Shanghai during the Second World War, we not only knew more about the difficulties faced by them, but also, more importantly, how the Chinese in Shanghai helped the Jews who escaped to China. At that time, the local Chinese lived under hardship brought about by the Japanese invasion. However, they willingly helped the Jews by providing job opportunities, daily necessities and shelters. This episode of history reflects the spirit of empathy, humanitarianism and benevolence, which we should respect and uphold.

Furthermore, what amazed us was with the involvement of the Jews in the local community, business and financing sectors of Shanghai maintained operation to a certain degree. This was mainly resulted from the vital contribution of this group of Jewish population in Shanghai. Finally, throughout the turbulences of the Second World War, particularly the Japanese invasion in China, the unity and peace exhibited by the Chinese inclusiveness towards the Jews should not be forgotten in human history. We should treasure this piece of history and inherit the positive values and attitudes therein.
